OK. You probably thought I would get to the point quickly. But this is a personal blog, and I want to think about this more. That's the reason I'm writing this post. Let's say you saw this: "Steps to a happier life: 1. Get a job. 2. Work hard and stay late 3. Don't ask for raises. 4. Keep your mouth shut. 5. Punch out on time." The writer of this quote is speaking to a generic reader. He's speaking from an anecdotal point of view. Let's imagine he saw this: "I have a friend who is a psychiatrist. His friend, David, got a job at a corporation, and the corporation has no work ethic. His colleague, Jennifer, works at the bank. Her supervisor is very hard on her. Every time David or Jennifer asks for a raise, their boss responds with, 'We are not paying raises.' They both work more than 40 hours a week. How can they be happy?" He's also speaking from an anecdotal point of view. Anecdotal evidence is not scientific evidence. Statistics are the only form of scientific evidence. Anecdotal evidence is anecdotal evidence. I know there are folks out there who believe this to be a belief of Christianity. My response to them is this: you can believe whatever you want, but I would be more comfortable with your religious belief if it were based on scientific evidence. My last post ended with the same thought: we cannot be sure what works. That is why we must strive for scientific evidence. Scientific evidence, on the other hand, is not anecdotal evidence. We can't use it, but we need it in order to determine the effects of events, interventions, treatments, drugs, remedies, and so on.Negative effects of a mutation in a potential cis-acting RNA-binding domain of yeast U5 snRNP-associated protein 5 and its evolutionary conservation. A: The schema only defines a validator that takes a string and returns a boolean for valid email addresses. You can just create your own validator that checks email addresses are valid. See the MongoDB docs for details. from mongoengine import * class EmailAddressValidator(UserField): def validate(self, value): try: from email.utils import parseaddr parseaddr(value) except ValueError: return False return True class User(Document): username = StringField(min_length=2) email = EmailField(validator=EmailAddressValidator) Don't forget to install the email module A: Yes, this is a bug:
